How much does a Piaget watch cost?

Just look at Geneva's auction results and you can find a few of Piaget's jewelry watches selling for more than $50,000 (jade and lapis, lapis, and turquoise). Because each piece is almost unique, it's hard to directly compare auction results, but look in catalogs for five years ago and you'll see prices were often half this.

What does 'S' Mean on a Piaget watch?

The 'S' stands for steel and it's also offered on a rubber strap; if we're being honest, it looks more like the Patek Philippe Aquanaut than a vintage Polo. One more look at the wide variety of the vintage Piaget style, courtesy of Mendel Watches.

What's a good vintage Piaget watch?

One more look at the wide variety of the vintage Piaget style, courtesy of Mendel Watches. I say this not as a knock to the modern Polo S - it's a pretty good watch on a rubber strap, a viable alternative to the Aquanaut and so many other rubber-strap or integrated bracelet watches.

Are Piaget watches bespoke?

At first, Piaget remained a fairly small operation and these stone dial watches were nearly bespoke, with Piaget even offering a customization service that allowed its clients to pick from a near-infinite combination of dials, bezels, bracelets, cases, and finishes.

When did Piaget start making watches?

Piaget didn't even register its own trademark until 1943, despite watchmaker Georges-Édouard Piaget founding his workshop in the Swiss Jura in 1874. For most of its existence, Piaget was just fine ticking in the background, quietly making some of the most capable mechanical movements in Switzerland.

Does Piaget have an all-steel watch collection?

Not until the introduction of the Polo S in 2016 would Piaget have an all-steel watch collection ('S' standing for steel). 'These ultra-thin movements opened the door to new creative possibilities - colors, dials, shapes, and new movements,' says Jean-Bernard Forot, Piaget's Head of Patrimony.
